"Look over that list, will you, Bill? Think I've put in everything I positively need and left out everything unnecessary. We'll just multiply that by five, and there you are."
"Powerful lot of sugar—and beans! Why, man, we'll only be out over two Sundays; why three pounds of beans apiece—no five, and part of them brown? Golly, man, d'ye think I'm a dago, to eat brown beans?"
"Doll—she did the grub—says we want heaps of sugar where it's cold, and that sugar is easier to pack and lighter than syrup—that we can make our own sugar syrup for hot cakes. Guess she knows. Same about beans—you'll notice that we have precious little canned meat—beans will be our steady, and with plenty of seasoning beans will taste good, believe me. Ever try 'em down at Domenic's? They say they're better yet at an elevation of 7000."

"We-e-ell, if you're sure—but I've got you in one place, Old Timer—not a cigarette in the bunch!"
"No, nor there ain't going to be—nor in your jeans, either. I set a forest fire once, and believe me, I set no more. Here in town a cigarette stub lands in a concrete gutter and dies peacefully. Up there it lights in a bunch of dry pine needles and while it is slowly dying it sets the world afire."
"Nonsense!"
"That's not argument, Bill—it's—it's—say persiflage. This is one case where I KNOW, AND NO PARTY I GO WITH TAKES A CIGARETTE. Besides, a pipe tastes heaps better. My wife never lets me smoke one at home—has an idea it smells. Out of doors Old Comfort and I can have peace."
